

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

EN
5880
H68

RUINS AT JAMESTOWN.

Three Hundred Years
of the Episcopal Church in America

By

GEORGE HODGES

Dean of the Episcopal Theological School
Cambridge, Massachusetts

Published for the Missionary Thank Offering Committee

By GEORGE W. JACOBS & CO.
Philadelphia

Copyright, 1906
BY GEORGE W. JACOBS & COMPANY
Published November, 1906

©17 May 09 E.S.

12-15-41 11:17 AM

Three Hundred Years
of the Episcopal Church in America

192993

Contents

INTRODUCTION	11
I. THE PARISH OF JAMESTOWN .	15
THE SETTLEMENT	17
The Virginia Company	17
The Expedition	18
The Landing	20
The Beginning of the Services	21
UNDER THE PRESIDENTS : TO 1610	23
The Hostility of the Indians	24
Captain John Smith	25
The Inexperience of the Settlers	26
Chaplain Hunt	29
The Starving Time	30
UNDER THE GOVERNORS : TO 1624	31
Deliverance of Delaware	32
Chaplain Buck	33
Gates and Dale	34
The Harvest of Tobacco	35
The First Representative Assembly	38
The First Massacre	40
The College	41

Contents

II. IN THE COLONIES . . .	44
DISABILITY AND UNPOPULARITY . . .	45
No Bishops	45
Puritan Majority	49
THE COMMISSARIES : 17TH CENTURY . . .	52
Virginia and Maryland	52
Blair and Bray	53
College of William and Mary . . .	54
The Venerable Society	55
The Carolinas	56
New England	57
Pennsylvania	60
New York	61
THE MISSIONARIES : 18TH CENTURY . . .	63
New Churches	63
The "Dark Day" at Yale	65
Dean Berkeley	67
Wesley and Whitefield	69
III. IN THE UNITED STATES . . .	74
CONSTRUCTION : TO 1812	75
The Church in the Revolution . . .	75
The New Leaders	78
Smith	78
Seabury	79
Scotch Consecration	81
Scotch Communion Office . . .	82
White	84

Contents

First General Convention (1785)	86
Preliminary Steps	86
Church in New England	89
Constitution	90
Prayer-Book	91
Plan for Episcopate	92
Consecration of White and Provoost	94
Second General Convention (1789)	95
State and Nation	95
Loss of King's Chapel	98
Loss of the Methodist Societies	100
A Period of Depression	102
CONTENTION : TO 1860	103
The War of 1812	104
The New Bishops	104
Hobart and Griswold	105
Ravenscroft and Moore	106
The Comprehensive Church	107
The Evangelical Movement	110
The Ecclesiastical Movement	115
The Two Seminaries	117
Domestic Missions	121
Chase and Otey	123
The Convention of 1835	127
Kemper	127
The Memorial	130
Muhlenberg and Potter	132
ACCESSION : TO 1907	134

Contents

The Civil War	134
McIlvaine and Polk	135
The General Conventions of 1862 and 1865	137
The Discussion of the Sacraments .	138
Baptism (regeneration) . . .	138
Holy Communion (ritual) . . .	139
Revision of Prayer-Book and Canons	140
Religion and Science	141
Religion and Society	144
The New Churchmanship	147
The Present Day	149

List of Illustrations

Ruins at Jamestown . . .	Frontispiece
The Right Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D. . . .	Facing page 22
The Right Rev. William White, D.D. . . .	“ “ 34
The Right Rev. Alexander Griswold, D.D. . . .	“ “ 46
The Right Rev. John Henry Hobart, D.D. . . .	“ “ 56
The Right Rev. Richard Channing Moore, D.D. . . .	“ “ 70
The Right Rev. John Stark Ravenscroft, D.D. . . .	“ “ 82
The Right Rev. James H. Otey, D.D., LL.D. . . .	“ “ 96
The Right Rev. Philander Chase, D.D. . . .	“ “ 108
The Right Rev. Jackson Kemper, D.D. . . .	“ “ 122
The Rev. James De Koven, D.D. . . .	“ “ 136
The Right Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D. . . .	“ “ 148

INTRODUCTION

THE Christian religion came to this country in two forms, one of which may conveniently be called Latin, and the other English.

Latin Christianity came first. It was preached in Mexico, and in the South and West, by missionaries from Spain. It was preached in Canada, and in the North and middle West, by missionaries from France. These missions were planted by men who never since have been surpassed in courage, self-sacrifice, and enthusiastic devotion ; and who have never been equaled in their understanding of Indian character and in their success in making Indian converts.

This form of Christianity was bound up with the fortunes of the two nations which brought it to these shores. They had neither the purpose nor the method which is necessary to a permanent settlement. Their purpose was to act as middlemen in the barter of furs and of gold between the savages of these forests and the citizens of Europe. Their method was to establish at every station a market and a fort. Thus the missionary had as his companions the trader and the soldier. But trade and war, under colonial conditions, tend to prevent men from establishing themselves permanently in the land in which they live. The soldier gets his orders and his pay from over the sea, and the trader looks forward to the time when he may spend his gains and the rest of his days in his own country. Neither the market nor the fort was rooted in the soil.

Introduction

Accordingly, in the inevitable contention for the mastery of this continent, the Latin colonists were at a disadvantage. They had money and arms and Indian allies, but they were opposed by men who were fighting for their homes. The

Introduction

Frenchmen and Spaniards were Frenchmen and Spaniards still, but the Englishmen were already Americans. After their defeat, the traders and the soldiers retired, for the most part, to their own land, and the missionaries went with them. From that time, Latin Christianity entered but slightly into our national life until it was brought back, within the memory of men still living, by immigrants who transferred to this country both their possessions and their allegiance. With this chapter in our religious history I am not now concerned.

English Christianity has existed here for now these three centuries in two forms, distinguished by differences in discipline and worship. On one side are those who retain from the long past the rule of bishops and the use of a book of prayer. On the other side are those who for various reasons have, for the time being, discontinued these ancient customs. The historic church came first, episcopal and liturgical, and began the English Christianity and the English civilization of this continent together, in 1607, at Jamestown. The non-episcopal and non-liturgical brethren followed, in 1620, at Plymouth.

Introduction

I purpose, so far as is possible within the limits of this essay, to tell the story of the Episcopal Church, first in its initial experiences at Jamestown, then in the colonies, then in the United States. It is a record of varied fortunes, of opportunities missed and of opportunities made fruitful, of contention within and prejudice without, of the statesmanship of bishops and the heroism of missionaries and the patience and faith of the people, of failures followed by great successes. To-day, by the grace of God, the Episcopal Church, for the first time, has a fair field, unhampered by political alliances, and unhindered by religious misunderstanding.

I

THE PARISH OF JAMESTOWN

THE first prayers prayed in English on this continent were in Prayer-book words. They preceded the beginnings of colonization.

The defeat of the Armada in 1588 made English settlements possible in America. Twice, immediately before that, English ships had anchored by these shores, and their chaplains had conducted the service of the English Church. On the coast of the Pacific, Francis Fletcher, of Drake's ship, the Pelican, had read the English prayers. A great stone cross in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco, commemorates the fact. A little later, on the coast of the Atlantic, Thomas Hariot "made declaration of the contents of the Bible" to the Indians of Roanoke Island, and presently, in 1587, the sacrament of baptism was administered for the first time on these shores, with use of the English language. Manteo, the first Indian convert, and Virginia Dare, the first child born of English parents in America, were received into the Church.

The Episcopal

Shortly after the destruction of the Armada, two English ships in command of Martin Pring landed at Plymouth harbor, and stayed there for six weeks. Probably they had prayers: it was the universal custom. If so, the Prayer-book was used in the neighborhood of Plymouth Rock while William Brewster was still postmaster of Scrooby, and William Bradford was still attending the parish church of Austerfield. Presently, an expedition in charge of Sir George Weymouth visited the coast of Maine, and set up a cross on Monhegan Island to show that Christian men had been there. On Sunday, August 9, 1607, a second expedition landed on the island, and the chaplain, Richard Seymour, held a service at the cross. This was the first religious service on the soil of New England, of which there is a definite record. But the colony was abandoned. English Christianity had already begun its vigorous life on this continent, on May 13th, of that year, at Jamestown.

Church in America

THE SETTLEMENT

Beginnings are so important and significant, and this particular beginning is now, after three centuries, so interesting to us, that I purpose, even in this brief history, to consider it at some length.

All attempts at American colonization by individual adventurers having failed, a new start was made in 1606 by introducing into the enterprise the joint-stock method. In that year, James I chartered the Virginia Company. The land thus granted extended along the Atlantic coast from Cape Fear to the Bay of Fundy. It was divided into three parts, of which the southern, from Cape Fear to the Potomac, was assigned to a group of proprietors who from their residence in London were called the London Company. The northern portion, from Long Island Sound to the Bay of Fundy, was assigned to another group of proprietors who from their residence in and about Plymouth in Devonshire were called the Plymouth Company. The middle section was to be awarded to such colonists of either company as should first establish self-supporting settlements in it. Each of these tracts extended back to the Pacific Ocean, which was thought to be one or two hundred miles distant across the country.

The Episcopal

On New Year's Day, 1607, the London Company sent three ships to sea,—the Discovery, the Godspeed and the Susan Constant. The names fitted well the aspirations of the men who in the spirit of adventure and of religion were seeking to set up a new home in a foreign land.

The commander of the fleet was Captain Christopher Newport, who had once retrieved the fortunes of Sir Walter Raleigh by capturing a Spanish treasure-ship whose cargo was worth four million dollars. The council of the colony was composed of Bartholomew Gosnold, Edward Wingfield, John Smith, John Ratcliffe, John Martin, and George Kendall. Gosnold was a mariner of experience, who in a previous voyage had named Cape Cod and Martha's Vineyard. Wingfield's father had had Queen Mary and Cardinal Pole for sponsors; John Winthrop, afterward governor of Massachusetts, was his cousin. Smith was a soldier of fortune, who had already distinguished himself in many amazing adventures in various parts of the world. The chaplain was Robert Hunt, "an honest, religious, and courageous Divine" of the English Church.

Church in America

The expedition was a commercial enterprise. It was not undertaken like the settlement of Plymouth, under the stress of ecclesiastical conditions, nor primarily for the advancement of religion. But it was sent forth in a religious spirit. "The way to prosper and achieve good success," said the paper of instructions, "is to make yourselves all of one mind for the good of your country and your own, and to serve and fear God, the giver of all goodness, for every plantation which our Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up."

The Episcopal

After a long and stormy passage, the three ships entered Chesapeake Bay in the last week in April, and made their way into Hampton Roads. The name Point Comfort testifies to their relief and joy. Sailing up the wide river which they named for King James, their patron, they disembarked on the 13th of May at a little peninsula. They called the place Jamestown, thus connecting the King's name with English Christianity in America, as it was soon to be connected with the English Bible. The land was low, and was even then fighting a losing battle with the river. But it was easily defensible, and this fact, in the present peril of savages and Spaniards, determined the settlement.

Church in America

They landed on Wednesday. On Thursday, they set about the erection of a fort, a three-cornered structure with a cannon at each angle. They prepared for Sunday by hanging up an old sail, fastening it to three or four trees, to shelter them from sun and rain; seats they made of logs; a bar of wood between two trees served for a pulpit. This was the Sunday after Ascension Day. The words of the Epistle, "The end of all things is at hand," may well have seemed to them a probable prophecy; but they prayed, "We beseech Thee, Lord, leave us not comfortless," and the ascription, "That God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion forever and ever," expressed the desires of their souls.

The Episcopal

"This," says Smith, in words which enable us to see that sight with the eyes of one who was himself a part of it, "this was our church, till we built a homely thing like a barne, set upon cratchets, covered with rafts, sedge and earth, so was also the walls: the best of our houses [were] of the like curiosity: but for the most part farre much worse workmanship that could neither well defend [from] wind nor raine." First the fort, for the preservation of their lives; then the Church for the salvation of their souls; this was the order of their building. "We had daily Common Prayer morning and evening," says Smith, "every Sunday two sermons, and every three months the Holy Communion, till our minister died; but our prayers daily, with a homily on Sundaies, we continued two or three years after, till more preachers came." There in the wilderness, with the river before, and the unbroken forest behind, every day began and ended with

THE RIGHT REV. SAMUEL SEABURY, D. D.

(See page 76)

1800

11700

Church in America

the Prayer-book prayers. The first Celebration of the Holy Communion was on the 21st day of June, being the Third Sunday after Trinity.

The affairs of Jamestown, under the London Company, were administered at first by Presidents who were elected by a local council. That lasted for two years. Then there was a new charter and it was therein provided that the colony should be administered by governors, appointed directly by the company itself. Finally, in 1624, the King annulled the charter, and took the control of the colony into his own hand. Thus the history of these early years is in two divisions : first, the period of the presidents, including the Starving Time of 1610 ; then, the period of the governors, including the General Massacre of 1622.

UNDER THE PRESIDENTS : TO 1610

The colony suffered at once from the

The Episcopal

hostility of the savages, and from the inexperience of the settlers.

The Indians of Virginia were of the Algonquin race, like those of New England. But the New England colonists came into no great peril from their savage neighbors until King Philip's War, in 1675, after half a century of peace. The Massachusetts Indians, before the coming of the English, had been broken in spirit by defeat and depleted in numbers by pestilence. The Virginia Indians, on the other hand, were ready to fight; they immediately began to distress the settlers. Within the first few days, a force of two hundred of them assaulted the unfinished fort, killing one Englishman, and wounding eleven others. Thereafter, for a long time, they lurked in the long grass, waiting with arrows for unwary white men.

From this peril the colony was saved, for some years, by the courage of Captain

Church in America

Smith. His services at Jamestown were paralleled later, in a lesser way, by Captain Standish at Plymouth. His adventure with Pocohontas established a truce with the stoutest of their savage neighbors. The Powhatan had his headquarters about fifteen miles from Jamestown on the north side of the York River, at what is now called Putin (i. e., Powhatan) Bay. A stone structure, commonly called Powhatan's chimney, marked the place until a March wind blew it down in 1888. There Pocohontas rescued Smith in a manner not uncommon among Indians, and he was formally admitted to their tribe. Even so, however, the peace was precarious and temporary. The colonists, ill-furnished with supplies and unskilled in hunting and fishing, were dependent upon the Indians for food. A concerted plan was formed to starve them out. This, Smith defeated by the might of a bold face and a confident voice, appealing to a fear which was close allied to ignorance. But the situation was full of danger.

The Episcopal

A more serious hindrance to the progress of the colony was the inexperience of the settlers. The process of successful colonization, even after several tragic lessons, had not yet been learned by the English people. The kind of men to send, and the equipment of tools and stores to send with them, had not yet been determined. Among the planters there were, indeed, four carpenters, a blacksmith, two brick-layers and twelve "labourers," together with a preacher, a surgeon, a sailor, a tailor and a barber; but the others were mostly gentlemen volunteers and servants.

By reason of the unfamiliar climate, and the malarious dampness of the camp, and the insufficiency of food, half of the colonists died between May and September. They had the same hard experience, a few years later, who faced the rigors of Plymouth. It was the inevitable consequence of a lack of understanding of the art of planting colonies. The settlers had no corn and no cattle. A little wheat and barley remained from the provisions of the ship, but most of it was spoiled. Their only drink was water from the river, which at high tide was salt and at low tide was foul. "Had we been as free from all sins as gluttony and drunkenness," said one of the company, "we might have been canonized for saints." Thus they spent the first summer. Next to Morning and Evening Prayer the most used service in the Prayer-book was that appointed for the burial of the dead. Captain Newport came back in January, 1608, with the "First Supply" of provisions and new colonists, and brought a "Second Supply" in September. This made the number about two hundred.

Church in America

Englishmen were still under a twofold delusion concerning America. They believed that it lay upon an easy route to India, and that the way was strewn with gold and jewels. The London Company charged Captain Newport, on pain of dismissal, to bring back either a lump of gold or a map of the route to the South Seas. These hopes, which were largely dispelled before the Puritan emigration, attracted adventurous spirits. Industrial conditions in England contributed another element to the colonial situation in Virginia. The land had not yet recovered from the social changes consequent upon the dissolution of the monasteries. When agriculture began to give place to sheep-raising, this turned great numbers of small farms into wide ranges of pasture land, and left farm laborers without employment. Moreover, the unprecedented increase in the amount of available gold from the mines of Peru had caused a calamitous rise in prices, thus magnifying the cost of living. The idle people, victims of these various changes, offered a tremendous economic problem for which the colonies seemed to offer some solution.

The Episcopal

Church in America

For the good of England, numbers of these people were transported to these shores. The good of America was not especially considered. Therefore many of the settlers who came in Newport's ships did but add to the difficulties and distresses of the Jamestown colony.

Captain Smith came presently into control, and Chaplain Hunt was his right hand. Together they administered the settlement, the man of the Fort and the man of the Church. Wingfield, in an extant account of those days, gives us a curious glimpse of the place of religion in the plantation. He is at pains to defend himself against an accusation that he had once asked the chaplain to omit the sermon. The Indians were about the town that day, he said, and by the time they were dispersed the sun was setting. "The preacher did aske me if it weare my pleasure to have a sermon : hee said hee was prepared for it. I made answere that our men were weary and hungry and that hee did see the tyme of the daie was farr past—and that if it pleased him, wee would spare him till some other tyme.” In general, Wingfield adds, “I never failed to take such noates by wrighting out of his doctrine as my capacity could comprehend, unless some raynie day hindered my indeavour.” Thus they spent their Sundays, the chaplain preaching, and the congregation of gentlemen and soldiers and laborers and servants, “wrighting out of his doctrine” according as their capacity could comprehend. The colony was an English parish,—lacking only wives and children,—in the wilds of Virginia.

The Episcopal

But the chaplain died, and Captain Smith, injured by an explosion of powder, returned to England, and Virginia saw him no more. The next exploits of this stout churchman were in New England, to which country he gave that name. Then came the Starving Time. There was no efficient discipline, and the stores were consumed. The Indians drove away the settlers' hogs, and killed the settlers whenever they had an opportunity. Winter came, and fierce cold with it, so that men froze to death. For lack of axes, or strength to wield them, or for fear of Indians, no trees were cut in the woods, but the cabins, as death emptied them, were burned for fuel. Even the protecting palisade, meant for use against the savages, was used for fire against the bitter frost. It was too much for the faith of some. One flung his Bible into the fire crying, "There is no God in heaven!"

Church in America

UNDER THE GOVERNORS : TO 1624

Meanwhile, in England, there had been a change in the charter of the company. The administration of the presidents had passed into the administration of the governors. A great new expedition was in preparation under the first colonial governor, Lord Delaware. Delaware was related on his mother's side to Queen Elizabeth. His sister's son became the first treasurer of Harvard College. Sir Thomas Gates was his lieutenant-governor.

The Episcopal

The fleet sailed with the prayers of the churches, one division starting first under Gates, the second following, some time after, under Delaware. The ship which carried Gates, the Sea Venture, was wrecked on the Bermudas. The others of the first expedition, the "Third Supply," reached Jamestown in the Starving Time, to which their hungry mouths contributed. After perils and escapes, of which Shakespeare made use in "The Tempest," Gates refitted his broken ships and came to Jamestown. Of five hundred settlers, only sixty were then alive. They had survived distresses which have no parallel in the tragic history of American colonization. They were then in the last extremities of weakness.

Gates had his chaplain with him, Master Buck. The first act was to assemble the settlers in the church. There, led by the minister, they prayed their prayers together. Then they took council one of another and determined to abandon the undertaking. They would forsake Virginia, and make their way to Newfoundland. Accordingly, they got together their few possessions, packed their bags and boxes, said farewell to Jamestown, which had become to them a cemetery rather than a settlement, and pushed out upon the river to the sea. At that moment, the ships of Lord Delaware came in sight. There he was, with men and provisions, for the rescue of the colony.

Church in America

Delaware knelt in prayer on the bank of the river, and they all joined in a silent thanksgiving to God for the sudden mercy of this deliverance. Then they went to church, and Master Buck preached, and offered praise and prayer. Thus with acts of devotion, in the spirit of piety, and in the name of God, the colony began to live anew. After that, they went on unfalteringly, in faith and courage, and were blessed increasingly. The colonists who had lived through the long starvation, were men of stout wills and stalwart bodies. The new arrivals were many of them artisans and mechanics. The church was repaired, and the daily service was resumed. Pews were made of cedar, and an altar of walnut. On Sundays the place was full of color from the wild flowers with which it was garnished, and from the scarlet cloaks of the fifty spearmen who composed the governor's body-guard.

The Episcopal

Delaware returned and first Sir Thomas Gates and then Sir Thomas Dale ruled in his stead. They were stern men, who had seen hard service in the Netherlands. They laid upon the colonists the obligations of laws which in our gentle times seem harsh. Settling in their minds what men ought to do, they made them do it, under severe penalties. And the compulsions included church attendance, and obedience to religion. That was a universal custom of the age, followed alike by Puritan and Churchman.

THE RIGHT REV. WILLIAM WHITE, D. D.
(See page 92)

Church in America

While Gates and Dale were thus enforcing order, John Rolfe was introducing into the Jamestown colony a kind of industry which from that time to this has determined, for better, for worse, the character of life in the South. They used to have a saying in Virginia that God made first man, then woman, thirdly corn, and fourthly tobacco. Rolfe began the cultivation of tobacco.

The general conditions of life in New England were settled by the glaciers, which made farming difficult by scattering stones over the fields, provided cod-fisheries by dropping stones into the sea, and dug the channels of the rivers whose waters should turn the wheels of mills. The New England settlers were accordingly gathered into many little communities, seated by harbors and waterfalls, and in the intervalles, where the holdings of land were small. Everything was right for the upbuilding of democracy.

The Episcopal

Until quite recent times it was the fashion with American historians, most of whom lived in New England, to disparage the Virginia colonists as cavaliers and aristocrats in contrast with their sturdy, hard-working, and progressive neighbors in Massachusetts. The fact that many of the historians were Puritans as well, tended to make this contrast more emphatic and significant. It is now perceived, however, by students of history, that the differences between the two localities have grown out of the soil itself. The settlers of Virginia and Massachusetts came substantially from the same English stock, and from the same conditions of English life. They were of the middle class, south and north alike, yeomen and tradespeople, with an intermingling in each colony of a few persons of gentle birth and breeding. With the exception of the Pilgrims of Plymouth, they were all Churchmen, Puritan Churchmen. The ecclesiastical differences and the social differences were developed, for the most part, after leaving England. The most potent force in this diverse development was the nature of the soil. Other influences, of course, came into play. The near neighborhood of the Plymouth Independents was a factor in the new growth of the Massachusetts men. The great number of clergymen of uncommon ability in the northern colony gave it a theological strain such as was unknown in the South. But the soil determined the difference.

Church in America

The soil of Virginia was congenial to the production of tobacco. This became almost immediately the great crop. It required wide estates. It needed a great number of laborers, but required very few of them to be skilled workmen. In consequence, the more enterprising of the settlers became landowners on a large scale. They lived in great houses, sepa-

The Episcopal

the governor was accustomed to sit in the chancel. A curious regulation provided that the taxes should be assessed at service time, all single men being taxed according to their dress, and married men according to the dress of their wives. Ruffs and laces, and coats and gowns of bright colors enlivened the Church on Sundays even in those early times. Already there had been a brilliant wedding, when Pocahontas and John Rolfe were married in the chancel in 1614. The brick church, whose tower remains, was fifty-six feet long and twenty-eight feet wide, and was built in 1639.

By the year 1622, the colony extended up the James River for a hundred and forty miles, a narrow strip of settled country through a region still in the hands of hostile savages. This hostility, however, had been almost forgotten in the eight years of peace. Suddenly, without warning, the Indians arose and massacred the colonists. They assaulted the whole line of settlements, and killed between three and four hundred people.

Church in America

This massacre prevented two excellent purposes with which the minds of the planters had been seriously occupied. It put a stop to all plans for Indian missions, and for higher education.

As for the Indians, their sudden victory was their destruction. The colony, recovering from its surprise and defeat, drove them away. Thenceforth, they were accounted "irreconcilable enemies," and if any came lurking about, the statutes empowered the captain to gather a party of his men and hunt them like wolves.

At the same time, the massacre killed the college. It is interesting to see how the English appreciation of learning, which founded Harvard College in 1636, moved the Jamestown colony in 1621. "It is a just and wholesome pride," says John Fiske, "that New England people feel in recalling the circumstances under which Harvard College was founded, in a little colony but six years of age, still struggling against the perils of the wilderness and the enmity of its sovereign. But it should not be forgotten that aims equally lofty and foresight equally intelligent were shown by the men who from 1619 to 1624 controlled the affairs of Virginia."

The Episcopal

They proposed to establish a university for English and Indian youths. The London Company endowed it with ten thousand acres of land ; the Archbishops contributed fifteen hundred pounds ; the Bishop of London added another thousand. An anonymous contributor, who signed himself "Dust and Ashes," promised a thousand more. Another benefactor was Nicholas Ferrar, of Little Gidding, the friend of George Herbert and of Isaak Walton. One donor gave his library, another provided Bibles and Prayer-books, another presented the Communion plate. Mr. George Thorp came over to be the Rector of the College. He had hardly arrived when the savages fell upon the settlements, and he was killed. Then for a good while, the energies of the colony were all needed for preservation and recuperation.

Church in America

The substantial and enduring strength of the settlement was shown by the confidence with which the planters undertook the restoration of their fortunes. But from that time, the History of Jamestown is merged in the larger annals of the colony in general.

II

IN THE COLONIES

AFTER the settlement of Jamestown, the history of the Church in the colonies is within a space of time whose boundaries we may set, for convenience of memory, at 1620 on the one side, and 1776 on the other.

This space of about one hundred and fifty years,—a half of our history,—falls naturally into two parts, the first being in the seventeenth century, and the second in the eighteenth. In the first of these periods, England was for the most part under the House of Stuart, in the second it was for the most part under the House of Hanover. In the first period our ancestors in England were engaged in ecclesiastical contentions, in the second they were engaged in political contentions. In the first period the Church in this country existed mainly in Virginia and Maryland, and was administered by commissaries of the Bishop of London; in the second, the Church appeared in all the colonies and was fostered by missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

Church in America

DISABILITY AND UNPOPULARITY

During this entire time, from the planting of Jamestown to the Declaration of Independence, the Church lay under the disability of an incomplete organization. It was without a resident bishop. Petitions without number were presented to the English authorities of both Church and State, asking for a bishop. They came from both sides of the ocean, from missionaries, from eminent laymen, from convocations of clergy.

Sometimes these petitions were declined by reason of indifference or ignorance. Church people in England knew little about this country and many of them cared less. We seemed to them like a poor plantation in the middle of the Soudan. Moreover, the only bishop who then seemed possible was a dignified person, who resided in a palace, had six horses to his carriage, and was accustomed to the society of courts. They could not imagine him in Jamestown.

The Episcopal

Sometimes the petitions were declined by reason of the current contentions. The wars of the seventeenth century kept the attention and interest of most men at home; they had no time to mind the colonies. The wars of the eighteenth century fostered the spirit of independence which at last asserted itself in the American Revolution; people in this country, at first Puritans, but afterward Churchmen also, objected to an institution which might hold the colonies more firmly to the English throne. Thus in the seventeenth century, when American Churchmen appealed for a bishop, they were met by English indifference; and in the eighteenth century, when English Churchmen were desirous that a bishop should be sent to America, they were met by American hostility; and there was no bishop.

THE RIGHT REV. ALEXANDER V. GRISWOLD, D. D.

(See page 103)

Church in America

There being no bishop, there was nobody here to ordain new ministers. Ordination could be had only by going to London. But that involved both expense and peril. The ships were beset not only by winds and waves, but by pirates and by smallpox. Accordingly the number of clergy was small. When the non-episcopal brethren came, with their easy and direct arrangements for the planting of parishes, they established themselves in strength; but the Church lacked leaders. Moreover, in consequence of this ordination journey, not only was the number of ministers small, but few of them had previously lived in America. During most of this period, the ministry of the Church was chiefly tan Revolution and the Restoration of the Stuarts. To their minds, the Church stood for the bigotry of bishops and the tyranny of kings. It represented a state of life from which they had escaped, and from which they hoped ever to be free. John Winthrop had a lot of books stored in a loft, and among them one in which the New Testament and the Prayer-book were bound together. One day, the mice got in and ate the Prayer-book, leaving the New Testament untouched. It seemed to Winthrop an appropriate mark of the disapproval of heaven.

The Episcopal

In Virginia, the Church was formally established by the House of Burgesses. A like action was afterward taken in Maryland. This colony, founded by Roman Catholics on principles of religious liberty, had come into possession of the Puritans during the Commonwealth, and then, after the Restoration, was administered by Churchmen. In the Carolinas, the Church was established by the proprietary charter. Maine and New Hampshire were founded by Churchmen. Charles I once hoped to make them superior to their Puritan neighbors. He appointed Ferdinando Gorges, the proprietor of Maine, and John Mason, the proprietor of New Hampshire, to positions of authority over all New England. Beacon Hill, in Boston, derives its name from the signal by which the Puritans were to warn the community of the approach of the Churchman. But the Churchman did not come, and the Church colonies soon fell into the hands of Massachusetts. In New York, an Act of Assembly taxed the people for the support of "Protestant" ministers, and this was interpreted by several governors who were Churchmen, to mean clergy of the Church of England; to that extent the Church was established in that colony.

Church in America

The Episcopal

THE COMMISSARIES: SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

The strength of the colonial church of the seventeenth century was in Virginia and Maryland. In 1650, and after, colonists came who had been driven out of England by the Puritans, as the Puritans had previously been expelled by the Churchmen. These were men who were devoted to ideals, and who had suffered for the sake of the King and of the Church. They imported a new and valuable quality into Southern life. The comforts of a gentle climate, the ease and plenty of the great plantations, the existence of a leisure class, brought serious temptations and affected clergy and laity alike. The story of the Southern Church in the middle of the century is not altogether pleasant reading, though the unpleasant features have been exaggerated out of perspective. The Virginia colonists who appealed to the Great and General Court of Massachusetts to send down ministers of the gospel, are found to be three congregations of Puritans who naturally desired Puritan preaching. The incident has been made to imply that the Virginia Churchmen were in need of missionaries. One remembers that Morton of Merrymount was accused of atheism by his neighbors in Boston, the basis of the charge, according to John Fiske, being the fact that he used the Book of Common Prayer! In Massachusetts as well as in Virginia, the colonists, Puritan and Churchman alike, were of the same blood, and met temptation sometimes with success, sometimes with failure. But after 1650 the Virginians improved much.

Church in America

Then the commissaries came, to represent the Bishop of London, and to exercise such discipline as was possible under the circumstances. The first was the Rev. James Blair, appointed for Virginia. He found seventy places of worship in the colony, all under the administration of the Church, half of them provided with ordained ministers, the other half having lay readers. There were parsonages for all the clergy, and extensive glebe lands. The second commissary was the Rev. Thomas Bray, for Maryland.

The Episcopal

Blair and Bray were impressed alike with the need of more ministers, and each endeavored, in his own way, to supply the need. Blair founded, in 1693, the College of William and Mary. Bray founded, in 1701, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

The College of William and Mary is the oldest school in the country, next to Harvard. It suffered bitterly both in the War of Independence and in the War of the Union, and has never recovered from these losses ; but in the colonial period it was an influential institution. It is remembered among scholars as the birthplace, in 1776, of the oldest literary society in this country, the Phi Beta Kappa. It is taken into account by historians as the nursery of the Southern men who took their great part in the making of the nation. Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, and John Marshall, the interpreter of the Constitution, were educated there. George Washington was Chancellor of the college. Out of this institution came young men of character and learning to minister to the parishes of the colonial church.

Church in America

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (The "Venerable Society," the "S. P. G.") was the first fruit of a new missionary zeal in England, and of a new interest in the welfare of the colonies. From the time of its formation the supply of clergy for the colonial church increased greatly, and much care was taken in the selection of them. The first missionaries of the Society, George Keith and John Talbot, made a general visitation of the colonies. They found fifty clergymen of the Church of England in this country, of whom seventeen were in Maryland and twenty-five in Virginia. Of the others, three were in the Carolinas, two in Pennsylvania, two in New England, one in New York. Outside of Virginia and Maryland, there were four church buildings : St. Philip's in Charleston (1682), King's Chapel in Boston (1689), Christ Church in Philadelphia (1695), and Trinity Church in New York (1697). A glance at these four parishes will complete our survey of the Colonial Church in the seventeenth century.

The Episcopal

1. In the Carolinas for twenty years after their settlement, there was no visible recognition of religion. The planters lived, for the most part, on large farms, each proprietor in the midst of his estate. In 1680, however, Reginald and Millicent Jackson provided a church lot in Charleston, and on it a church building was presently placed. An early rector, Samuel Marshall, was so well liked that the Assembly appropriated to him and his successors a stipend of one hundred and fifty pounds, and added as a personal gift "a negro man and woman and four cows and calves."

THE RIGHT REV. JOHN HENRY HOBART, D. D.
(See page 103)

Church in America

2. The settlers of New England who landed at Plymouth in 1620, were separatists who had definitely left the Church of England. But the settlers who landed at Salem in 1630 were members of the Church. "Farewell," they said, "dear England! Farewell the Church of God in England, and all the Christian friends there! We do not go to New England as Separatists from the Church of England, though we cannot but separate from the corruptions of it: but we go to practise the positive part of church reformation and propagate the Gospel in America." "We desire you would be pleased to take notice of the principals and body of our company," wrote Winthrop, "as those who esteem it our honor to call the Church of England, from which we rise, our dear mother, and we cannot part from our native country, where she specially resideth, without much sadness of heart, and tears in our eyes, ever acknowledging that such hope and part as we have obtained in the common salvation, we have received it in her bosom, and suckt it from her breasts." They were of the opinion, however, that in their departure from England they had departed not from the faith nor from the communion of the National Church, but from its rubrics and canons. They were to establish a Church of America, making their own rubrics and canons as the new needs demanded. This position thus taken by the Churchmen who founded the colony of Massachusetts was that which was afterwards taken by the Churchmen who, after the Revolution, organized the Episcopal Church. But the Churchmen of 1630 were in the midst of the stress of a great ecclesiastical contention, and they went into 'an extreme wherein they dispensed even with the Bishop and the Prayer-book. The Churchmen of 1785 lived in times when their judgment was not affected by the strife of parties.

The Episcopal

Church in America

The Puritans found William Blackstone, a graduate of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, the only occupant of the present site of Boston. He was a clergyman who had left England because, as he said, he did not like the Lord Bishops. Presently, after Endicott and his company settled in the vicinity, he moved again, finding that he had still less liking for the Lord Brethren.

When New Hampshire, in 1641, and Maine, in 1652, came under the control of Massachusetts, the Rev. Richard Gibson had a church and parsonage at Portsmouth, and the Rev. Robert Jordan was ministering at Portland and in parts adjacent. The Puritans ejected Gibson, and made life hard for Jordan.

The Episcopal

The Rev. Robert Ratcliffe was the first clergyman to establish himself successfully in New England. This he did in Boston, under the protection and patronage of the royal governor. At first in the town house, then in the Old South meeting house, in the face of the indignation of most of the citizens, he wore his surplice and read prayers out of the book. On Sunday, May 30, 1686, the liturgy was first publicly read in colonial New England, and on June 15th, a parish of the Church of England was organized in Boston. King's Chapel was built for the new congregation.

3. In Pennsylvania, George Keith, the S. P. G. missionary, had been a Quaker, and had exercised a helpful and eminent ministry in the Society of Friends. When he became convinced of the need of sacraments and orders, and was received into the Church, a good many of his friends and sympathizers came with him. Under these circumstances, Christ Church was founded in Philadelphia. The Rev. Evan Evans, who ministered there during the first eighteen years of the eighteenth century, is said to have baptized, in the first third of that time, as many as eight hundred Quakers. Along with this success, however, there was an unavoidable accompaniment of bitterness and hostility. The Church in Philadelphia was disliked by the Quakers, by whom that city was mainly inhabited, as the Church in Boston was disliked by the Puritans.

Church in America

4. Only in New York was the Church given a hospitable welcome. The Dutch founders of that colony had no quarrel with the Church of England. When the province came into English possession, the Dutch Reformed congregation shared with their Anglican brethren the use of the Church in the fort, the Dutch worshipping there in the morning, the English in the afternoon. In 1693, the Assembly enacted that the four counties of New York, West Chester, Queens and Richmond should have five "Protestant" ministers supported by public taxation, and that all freeholders should be entitled to vote for wardens and vestrymen. The word "Protestant" being interpreted to mean the form of religion accepted in the Protestant nation of which the colonies were a part, the vestry of the city of New York, in 1695, called Mr. William Vesey to be the first minister of Trinity Church, on condition that he be episcopally ordained. In 1697, the church being unfinished, Mr. Vesey was inducted into his position by the governor of New York, in the Dutch church. In 1705, the parish was presented with the Queen's farm, a considerable tract of uncultivated land, which has since proved uncommonly productive. There was a Dutch church, and a French church for Huguenots; Trinity was the parish church of all the English-speaking citizens.

The Episcopal

Church in America

THE MISSIONARIES : EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

The ministrations of the missionaries of the S. P. G. gave an immediate impulse to the life of the colonial church. Wherever they went, congregations were assembled, old parishes were revived, new ones were organized, in many places churches were built. The missionaries found "a great ripeness and inclination among all sorts of people to embrace the Gospel." In Virginia and Maryland there was little need of their services. The society sent only seven missionaries into those parts. But in the other colonies, for seventy-five years, the society was the mainstay. During that time it supported, wholly or in part, three hundred clergymen.

Rhode Island responded at once to the efforts of the new men. Trinity Church in Newport was planted in 1702, and built its present sanctuary in 1726. St. Paul's, Kingston, commonly called the

The Episcopal

"Narragansett Church," was erected in 1707, and is still standing. St. Michael's, Bristol, followed in 1719, and St. John's, Providence, in 1722.

In Boston, to King's Chapel was added Christ Church (1723) and Trinity (1735). Queen's Chapel in Portsmouth (1732) had for its first rector Arthur Brown, who figures in Longfellow's "Lady Wentworth" in the "Tales of a Wayside Inn."

St. Mary's Church appeared in Burlington, N. J. (1703) and was talked of as a good seat for a bishop of America. St. Peter's Church (1716) was established at Albany, the rector also serving as a missionary to the Mohawk Indians.

The new ministers were men of learning and piety. It is true that the second rector of Providence was blown out of church one Sunday by "an extraordinary gust of wind," and the people, welcoming this ejection as an act of heaven, refused to let him in again. But this was a notable exception.

Church in America

The services were for the most part very plain, without chanting, the Psalms being sung in metre to the arrangement of Tate and Brady. The surplice was little used, but the scarlet coats and rich laces of the congregation, gave the church, as reported by a visitor to Portsmouth, "a gay and shining appearance."

The chief events of this pre-revolutionary period of the eighteenth century were the "Dark Day" at Yale in 1722, the visit of Dean Berkeley in 1729, and the missions of John Wesley and George Whitefield.

1. On the day after commencement in 1722, the faculty of Yale College, together with five prominent pastors of Connecticut, called the trustees into the library and presented to them a letter stating an extraordinary change of mind. They said that they had become convinced of the invalidity of Presbyterian ordination and that they deeply felt the difficulties under which they labored in relation to their continuance out of the visible communion of an Episcopal church. The college at that time had but thirty-five students, and a rector and a tutor composed the faculty. But the position and character of these teachers, and of the pastors who joined in their secession, gave their declaration an importance of the highest magnitude. Puritanism was the established order in Connecticut. It was struck as with a blow. The occasion was remembered as the "Dark Day." These eminent converts had read their way into the church. Without personal acquaintance of clergy or laity, studying the books in the college library, they had found that the path of truth, as they were convinced, brought them to the church door. Thereafter the church progressed in Connecticut, being commended to the people by the solid attainments, the intelligent loyalty, and the elevated character of the clergy. Churchmen were respectfully termed "sober dissenters."

The Episcopal

Church in America

2. Samuel Johnson, who next to Rector Cutler was the most substantial person in this transaction, entered presently into important conference with a remarkable visitor to these shores, whose name and memory are among our most valuable possessions. Dean Berkeley, afterward Bishop of Cloyne, famous already in philosophy as well as in religion, arrived in Newport in 1729 and stayed until 1731. In those two years he made a deeper impression upon the Colonial Church than any other individual. Berkeley was one of the first Englishmen to perceive the importance of the American colonies. He it was who saw that "westward the course of empire takes its way." He conceived the idea of founding a university for our benefit in the Bermudas. Sir Robert Walpole, being Prime Minister at that time, had promised to endow the institution with an appropriation of twenty thousand pounds from the public treasury. He suggested that Berkeley would be more likely to get it if he showed his zeal by actually coming over to these shores. This he therefore did, arriving at Newport in the midst of a saint's day-service, and being welcomed at the wharf by the rector and the congregation. The Bermuda University never came to life, but the Dean's visit stimulated several projects which had already been formed for higher education in the colonies. The belief in good learning as the handmaid of religion, which had already appeared in the proposed college of 1619, and in the actual college of William and Mary in 1693, had projected a plan for a church college in the two cities which, with Boston, were the most considerable in the country. The idea was to found an institution for higher education in New York, and another in Philadelphia. Such was the weight of Samuel Johnson in these negotiations that each of these colleges called him for first president. He declined the call of the College and Academy of Philadelphia, now the University of Pennsylvania, and accepted the invitation of King's College, now Columbia University in New York. In the arrangement of each of these schools, he and his friends were greatly guided by the counsels of Dean Berkeley.

The Episcopal

Church in America

3. In the middle of the eighteenth century, the quiet current of religious life both in England and in America, was vigorously disturbed by a new kind of preaching. In America, the Great Awakening, in England, the Great Revival, stirred the hearts of the people as they had not been stirred since the Reformation. Each of these renewals of the religious life was due in great part to the inspiration of clergymen of the Colonial Church. The prophet of the Great Awakening was George Whitefield; the father of the Great Revival was John Wesley.

The Episcopal

Wesley came as a missionary of the Venerable Society to Georgia, and was made rector of Christ Church in Savannah. He entered upon his duties in a spirit of great devotion, living an ascetic life and laying upon himself and his parishioners the discipline of an extreme churchmanship. In a time when canons and rubrics were commonly observed with a good deal of discretion, and in a back woods community where, if anywhere, such discretion was needed, he amazed and offended the parish by his insistence on the details of canonical obedience. He baptized children by immersion, admitted none but communicants as sponsors, refused the Holy Communion to dissenters, and declined to read the burial service over the unbaptized. These obligations passed the patience of the people, and Wesley gave up in much depression of spirit, and returned to England. He praised the devout living of his neighbors, the clergy of South Carolina, "among whom," he says, "in the afternoon [at a clerical conference] there was such a conversation, for several hours, on 'Christ our Righteousness,' as I have not heard at any Visitation in England, or hardly any other occasion." But his congregation disappointed him. This was a part of the novitiate through which he passed to the great work of his life.

THE RIGHT REV. RICHARD CHANNING MOORE, D. D.
(See page 104)

Church in America

The ship which carried Wesley back to begin the Great Revival passed the ship which was bringing Whitefield to take his mighty part in the Great Awakening. Whitefield succeeded Wesley in the Savannah parish, and filled the church so that people stood outside at all the doors and windows. He founded a school for orphans, and dreamed, like a good Churchman, of a college in Georgia. But Whitefield was preëminently a preacher. In that calling, he found his power. The Great Awakening, under the impulse of Jonathan Edwards, had already laid its stress on the importance of religious feeling. A true Christian, according to this new teaching, was one who had passed through a clearly defined subjective experience. No man ever lived who was more gifted than Whitefield in the ability to appeal to emotion, and to induce this subjective experience. He gave himself, therefore, to the Great Awakening. Resigning his parish, he became what we would call a mission preacher. In the debate, however, between feeling and living, between emotion and order, the Church, for the most part, maintained the old position. Whitefield found the larger number of sympathetic brethren elsewhere. Often the meeting house was open to him when the church was shut.

The Episcopal

The Great Awakening was both a help and a hindrance to the Church. It was a hindrance in that it seemed for the moment to put the Church in the wrong regarding the spiritual life. Churchmen were cold, when their neighbors were at a white heat. But in the main the Revival helped the Church. The quiet maintenance of liturgical worship, the self-restraint, the emphasis on conduct, the reliance of the Church on Christian nurture rather than on sudden conversion, commended our ways to many sober and thoughtful persons, who sought refuge in our sanctuaries from the thunder and lightning of the revival preachers.

Church in America

III

IN THE UNITED STATES

THE American Revolution divides the history of the Episcopal Church into two almost equal parts. With the Declaration of Independence the first era of our history came sharply to an end and the second era began. From that time to the present, it is convenient to divide the space, for purposes of easy memory, by the two intervening wars, the War of 1812 and the War of 1860. The dominant note of the years to 1812 was Construction ; the Church was effecting an adjustment to the new conditions, framing a constitution, completing an organization. A distinctive, though not equally dominant note, from 1812 to 1860, was Contention ; the Church, coming into new life and vigor, was developing a corporate consciousness, with good Churchmen at one extreme calling one way, and good Churchmen at the other extreme calling another way. From 1860 to the present day has been, in the main, a time of Accession ; neither party having controlled the Church, but both having joined in the meeting of new difficulties and the performance of new tasks, the united Church has prospered exceedingly.

Church in America

CONSTRUCTION : TO 1812

A good number of the men whose energy and wisdom achieved our independence and shaped our institutions were Churchmen. Outside of New England, the leaders of the new nation were mostly of our communion. Not only were Jefferson and Marshall educated at a Church college, but Lee, who moved the Declaration of Independence, was a

The Episcopal

Churchman ; Patrick Henry was a Churchman ; Benjamin Franklin was a Churchman, though not a very sound one ; Robert Morris, whose self-sacrificing efforts in the field of finance reinforced the courage of our soldiers on the field of battle, was a Churchman ; John Jay and James Madison were Churchmen ; Washington was a Churchman.

The first session of the Continental Congress was opened with the prayers of Jacob Duché, rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia. Samuel Adams, of Massachusetts, moved that the rector be invited to perform this office. John Adams wrote to his wife that the parson appeared with his clerk "and in his pontificals," that he read the thirty-fifth Psalm, which responded in an extraordinary manner to the "horrible rumor of the cannonade of Boston," and that he then struck out into an extemporary prayer for America, for the Congress, and for Boston. "I must confess," says

Church in America

Adams, "I never heard a better prayer, or one so well pronounced."

Nevertheless, so many of our clergy and laity were royalists at that critical time that the Church in general was considered a tory company. Brattle Street in Cambridge was called indifferently Tory Row or Church Row ; the two names meant the same thing. In Virginia and Maryland, a third of the clergy maintained the cause of the Revolution, but in the other colonies they were mostly on the other side. This was the natural result of the lack of bishops, in consequence of which, all ordinations being performed in London, few Americans by birth had entered the ministry. The clergy had come over from England in mature life, they had been supported by an English society, and they had English sympathies. Dr. Parker in Boston and Dr. White in Philadelphia changed the state prayers to meet the changed conditions, but they were exceptions. Other clergy, in great numbers, left their parishes, voluntarily or involuntarily, and sought refuge in Nova Scotia. No other religious body was seriously injured by the American Revolution. The Church was almost destroyed.

The Episcopal

Out of this forlorn condition the Church was brought into new life by the services of three men: Dr. Smith of Maryland, Dr. Seabury of Connecticut, and Dr. White of Pennsylvania. They represented the three divisions of the country, the south, the middle, and the north, and they undertook the various forms of action which were needed under the circumstances. Dr. Smith looked after the church property; Dr. Seabury secured the apostolic succession; Dr. White brought the colonial churches together.

1. Dr. William Smith was the first Provost of what is now the University of Pennsylvania. Oxford had given him his divinity degree. A sermon on the Present

Church in America

Situation of American Affairs, preached in Christ Church, Philadelphia, in 1775, had greatly stirred the zeal of patriots. During the war he had been dismissed from the college, as being an Episcopal minister, though afterward he returned. In 1780, he called a conference of clergy and laity in Maryland, at Chesterton. At this conference a petition was prepared asking the Assembly of that state to give the disestablished church a civil existence, empowering vestries to collect money and pay salaries. A name was needed for such legislation, and the name Protestant Episcopal was selected then and there.

2. Dr. Samuel Seabury had been a chaplain in the British army during the war. The son of a Congregational family and a graduate of Yale, he was now a priest of the Church in Connecticut. In 1783, the year in which peace was proclaimed, ten of the fourteen clergy of that state met at the house of the Rev. John Rutgers Marshall, rector of St. Paul's Church, Woodbury, and elected a bishop. They called no laymen into their council, and they imposed the seal of secrecy on all the members of their company. The situation was still full of peril. They chose Seabury to be their bishop. He was to go to England and obtain consecration, if possible, from bishops of the Church of England; failing in that endeavor, as seemed altogether likely, he was to apply to the non-juring bishops of Scotland.

The Episcopal

Seabury was courteously received by the ecclesiastical authorities in England, but there were serious obstacles in the way of his wishes. Some of these were wholly political. A bishop must take an oath of allegiance. Parliament, indeed, might relieve Seabury from this requirement, but there was a feeling in some minds that such an act would be ill received in America, where most people, it was thought, had strong objections to bishops. Other hindrances proceeded from the situation. Seabury, it appeared, did not represent any national church. He was the choice of a little group of obscure persons in a single colony. An anxious year having been spent in fruitless negotiation, Seabury turned to his alternative. He applied to Scotland.

Church in America

There were then in Scotland two Episcopal communions, each with its bishops. One was in cordial relation with the Church of England. The other had been founded a century before by the Churchmen who had declined to change their allegiance from James II to William III. These Churchmen, from their refusal to take the new oath, were called Non-jurors. There were bishops among them, and they had consecrated successors. It was to these successors of the non-juring bishops that Seabury now betook himself. They were in good standing, according to canon law ; their only disability was on the side of civil law. This disability was now their opportunity. They were in a position to consecrate a bishop for America without raising any question of international politics, and without requiring any oath of allegiance. By them, therefore, Seabury was duly consecrated at Aberdeen, on Sunday, November 14th, 1784. Robert Kilgour, primus of the non-jurors, was the consecrator, and Arthur Petrie, Bishop of Ross and Moray, and John Skinner, Bishop Coadjutor of Aberdeen, assisted.

The Episcopal

The Scotch bishops made a single request of Seabury. They asked him to endeavor to persuade the Church in America to adopt the Communion Office of the non-jurors. This liturgy was a return, in some measure, to the original English Prayer-book of 1549. The prayer of consecration in that book consisted of three parts: an Intercession, a recital of the Institution,—that is, of

THE RIGHT REV. JOHN STARK RAVENSCROFT, D. D.
(See page 104)

Church in America

our Lord's words at the Last Supper—and an Oblation, consisting first of an offering of the "holy gifts" and secondly of an offering of "our souls and bodies." In the prayer-book as it was in England in Seabury's time, and still remains, the Intercession was taken out of the Prayer of Consecration, and made into the prayer for the Church Militant; and, the first part of the Oblation being omitted, the second part was made an alternative form of thanksgiving after the Lord's Prayer. Only the Institution remained in place. In the Scotch book the Prayer of Consecration began with the Institution; then followed, from 1549, the Oblation of the holy gifts, beginning "Wherefore, O Lord," and ending "unto us by the same"; then was interposed a wholly new Invocation, taken from the liturgies of the Eastern Church, where it is a characteristic and invariable feature, beginning "And we most humbly," and ending "blessed Body and Blood" ; and the prayer ended with the Oblation of our souls and bodies, beginning "And we earnestly desire," and ending "world without end." Thus the prayer contained two paragraphs which had no place whatever in the English book, the Oblation of the holy gifts and the Invocation of the Holy Spirit.

The Episcopal

Bishop Seabury promised to do his best to induce the American Church to make these changes, and so took his leave, finally reaching home in 1785. In August of that year he presided over the first convocation of his clergy.

3. William White was a native of Philadelphia. His attention had been turned to the ministry by a sermon which Whitefield, then an old man, preached in the parish church. Going to England for ordination, he remained for a year and a half, making many friends. Boswell's "Life of Johnson" contains a letter which that great person wrote to young Mr. White, after his return, in 1773. Goldsmith, he tells him, has a new comedy in rehearsal at Covent Garden, which "deserves a very kind reception." This was "She Stoops to Conquer." "No book," he says, "has been published since your departure of which much notice is taken." Becoming rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, in succession to Dr. Duché, he was appointed chaplain to the Continental Congress in 1777. His brother-in-law, Robert Morris, warned him that to accept the place was to offer his throat to be cut, but he accepted it. Thereafter, he was an honored member of the group of eminent men who were directing the course and forming the future of the nation. These men were engaged in the interests of all the colonies together. They were bringing the independent provinces into the United States. White was of their temper and disposition. While Dr. Smith was busy with the problems of Maryland, and Dr. Seabury was organizing the Church in Connecticut,

Church in America

The Episcopal

Dr. White had in mind a union of all the provincial churches under a common body of canon law. From him proceeded the movement which resulted in the first General Convention.

The initial step toward this Convention was taken in May, 1784, while Seabury was still abroad, six months before his consecration. A little company of clergymen met at New Brunswick, in New Jersey, as members of the Corporation for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the Clergy. This corporation, founded by Dr. Smith, was the only general institution of the Colonial Church. Its members came from New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Meeting thus, to arrange the financial future of the society, they took the opportunity to confer together upon the ecclesiastical situation. Dr. White presided. They agreed to call a meeting of representatives of all the states in October, at New York.

Church in America

The second step toward the Convention was a conference, summoned by Dr. White, of the clergy and laity of Pennsylvania. This meeting is memorable for the fact that the parishes were formally represented by laymen as well as by clergymen. This arrangement had no precedent in England. It was a natural result of the history of the Colonial Church. With no bishop, and with few clergy, the administration of ecclesiastical affairs had been of necessity, to a great extent, in the hands of the laity. There they were, and there, happily, they have ever since remained. When Dr. White asked the Pennsylvania parishes to send lay delegates, he thereby recognized and confirmed one of the distinctive characteristics of the Episcopal Church.

Another contribution was made by Dr. White to the progress of our affairs by presenting to this meeting a statement of Fundamental Principles. There should be a General Convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States of America ; the deputation of each state to such a convention should consist of clergy and laity ; wherever there should be a bishop he should be considered ex officio a member of the convention ; the Church thus organized should maintain substantially the doctrine, discipline and liturgy of the Church of England. These principles were communicated to the Churchmen of the several states for discussion at New York.

The Episcopal

The third step toward the General Convention was the New York meeting in October. Eight states were represented. But in most of them the delegates came not from a state convention but from individual parishes. Accordingly, the conference had no authority to legislate. However, they discussed and in the main approved Dr. White's Fundamental Principles. They called a convention to meet in Philadelphia, September 27, 1785.

Church in America

On that date, then, in Christ Church, Philadelphia, the first General Convention met. It was composed largely of deputies from Virginia and Maryland; of the sixteen clergymen, ten, and of the twenty-four laymen, fourteen, came from these states. Nobody was present from New England. The Church in New England stood for the moment by itself. It was fully organized, with a bishop duly consecrated, it had invited the brethren of the other states to meet in Connecticut and organize a national church. It had declined the invitation of the other brethren to the convention in Pennsylvania, on the ground that the Fundamental Principles did not give proper precedence to the bishop. Moreover, the consecration of Seabury had displeased many. He had obtained it, they complained, without the knowledge of the rest of the Church, and from a source which was, to say the least, unfortunate. Seabury did not know how he would be received. Therefore, the New England brethren stayed away and the first General Convention proceeded without them.

The Episcopal

Dr. White was chosen to preside. A committee was appointed to report (1) a Constitution, (2) a Revision of the Book of Common Prayer, and (3) a Plan for Obtaining the Consecration of Bishops. The committee began their work on Tuesday ; on Saturday, they reported a Constitution and Prayer-book ; on the following Tuesday, the convention adopted the constitution ; on Wednesday, they ordered the new Prayer-book to be printed. Meanwhile, they had accepted a proposed plan for the episcopate. On Friday, October 7th, they adjourned, after a session of ten days. Few legislative bodies have accomplished so much in so short a time.

Most of this work was the result of careful preparation. The constitution, for example, was based on Dr. White's Principles. To them it added a provision for the ratification of the Prayer-book as amended, and a declaration, substantially as now in use, to be made before ordination, accepting the doctrine, discipline and worship of the church and acknowledging the Scriptures as the word of God. This constitution, under which the church is living to this day, was declared, when ratified by the church in the several states, to be unalterable except by the General Convention.

Church in America

The Prayer-book was the work of Dr. Smith. At the close of the convention, he preached a sermon explanatory of the changes. "We stood arrested," he said, "at an awful distance. It appeared almost sacrilege to approach the porch or lift a hand to touch a single point, to polish a single corner, or to clear it from its rust of years." It appeared, however, that after this moment of devout timidity, the revisers had proceeded with much boldness. The printed book showed that they had omitted all the imprecatory

The Episcopal

Psalms, nineteen of the Thirty-nine Articles, both the Athanasian and the Nicene Creeds, and had subtracted one article from the Apostles' Creed, besides innumerable minor changes of words and phrases, bad and good. Two services were added, one for the Fourth of July and one for Thanksgiving day.

The plan for obtaining the episcopate consisted of an address to the bishops and archbishops of the Church of England. It set forth, in the name of all the American churches there represented, the need of an Anglican succession. It was accompanied by certificates from several states testifying that such an application was in no way objectionable to the civil authority. The local conventions were counseled to elect suitable persons as bishops for their respective states.

The constitution and the Prayer-book had to await ratification by a succeeding convention, but the address to the English bishops called for immediate action.

Church in America

John Adams, minister to the court of St. James, presented it to the Archbishop of Canterbury in person. The reply of the prelates was most encouraging. They recognized the appeal as the voice of a national church. They desired, however, an assurance that the church in America proposed to continue in the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Church of England. A correspondence ensued, being carried forward on our side by Dr. Smith and John Jay, first chief justice of the United States. The proposed book alarmed the English bishops, who insisted on the integrity of the Apostles' Creed, and the restoration of the Nicene Creed at least. But already the book had been declined by most of the dioceses, so it was easy to promise compliance with these wishes. Finally, the two archbishops wrote that Parliament was ready to pass a bill enabling them to consecrate bishops for America.

Meanwhile, Pennsylvania had elected

The Episcopal

White, and Maryland had elected Smith, Griffith had been chosen by Virginia, Provoost by New York. Smith, however, had declined, for various reasons; and Griffith could not afford the journey. So White and Provoost went, and on Sunday, February 4, 1787, were consecrated in the chapel of Lambeth Palace. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. John Moore, was the consecrator; the Archbishop of York, Dr. William Markham, was the presenter. The Bishop of Bath and Wells and the Bishop of Peterborough assisted in the consecration. It was a very quiet, not to say domestic, service, and Bishop White noted that even the sermon, preached by a chaplain, "had very little reference to the particularity of the occasion." In 1790, a third bishop was added to these two, and thus the English succession was fully assured, by the consecration of James Madison to be Bishop of Virginia.

A year before this consecration, the church met by its deputies in the second General Convention. The year 1789 is memorable in our national annals as that in which, by the adoption of the Constitution, the United States became a nation. The convention met in Philadelphia, where the national constitution had been ratified. The session of the convention in which the constitution of the Church was adopted was held in the State House, in the same room in which the national constitution had previously been signed.

Church in America

These coincidences corresponded with a remarkable likeness of the government thus provided for the Church with the government which had been provided for the nation. Each was founded on a written constitution. By adopting this constitution, thirteen independent ecclesiastical provinces became the dioceses of one church, as thirteen independent colonies had become the states of one nation. Diocesan conventions answered to State conventions, and the General Convention to the Congress of the United States. The House of Clerical and Lay Deputies was like the House of Representatives ; and the House of Bishops was like the Senate except in the matter of tenure of office. The principles of representative government controlled the Church as they controlled the State. The congregation elected the vestry ; the vestry, sometimes with the formal approval of the congregation, selected the rector. The rector and certain elected deputies from the congregation represented the parish in the diocesan convention. These representatives jointly chose the bishop. The bishop and certain elected deputies, clerical and lay, from the diocesan conventions represented the diocese in the General Convention. In that convention no change could be made in the constitution or in the Prayer-book unless it were first enacted by one General Convention, then reported back to all the dioceses, and then at the next General Convention reënnacted. In one respect, the Church was more democratic than the State; it gave no man executive authority. There was a presiding bishop, but no president. This likeness of the administration of the Church and of the State came naturally from the fact that the same men were engaged in the two transactions.

The Episcopal

THE RIGHT REV. JAMES H. OTEY, D. D., LL. D.
(See page 121)

Church in America

Another resemblance between the political and the ecclesiastical conditions was the immediate appearance of party differences. Bishop Seabury was not only in the Scotch succession, but he was a tory and a high churchman. Bishop Provoost, on the other hand, despised the Scotch succession, hated tories with a conscientious hatred, and disagreed seriously with Seabury's churchmanship. When Provoost heard that Seabury had been invited to the second General Convention and had accepted the invitation, he refused to be present. In this unpleasant situation, Dr. White's courtesy, largeness of mind, serenity of spirit and good sense saved the Church from immediate division.

The Episcopal

The convention of 1789 made a few changes in the constitution and adopted it. They made a few alterations in the English Book of Common Prayer, disregarding the Proposed Book, but accepting, with a slight amendment, the Prayer of Consecration of the Scotch non-jurors.

Meanwhile, two events, one of a local, the other of a general importance, showed the need of a strong government. The local event was the loss of King's Chapel in Boston : the general event was the separation of the Methodist societies.

1. During the British occupation of Boston, the Old South Meeting House had been used as a riding-school for soldiers. After the British troops were driven out, the congregation of the Old South took possession of King's Chapel while their own church was being repaired. The rector and most of the parishioners had fled to Nova Scotia. When the Old

Church in America

South people had returned to their own place, with many thanks to the wardens for their hospitality, and a remnant of the former congregation had resumed the prayer-book services, Dr. Parker of Trinity wrote in 1784 to Dr. White that King's Chapel "is now supplied by a Lay Reader who is a candidate for Holy Orders." The lay reader was James Freeman, whose ministry was highly acceptable to the parish. But Mr. Freeman, presenting himself as a candidate for orders, was found to have adopted Unitarian opinions. He failed, accordingly, of ordination, but he succeeded in commending his opinions to the parish. Pews forfeited by the flight of their owners had by this time been sold, so Churchmen complained, to persons "who never were of the Episcopal Church, and who hold sentiments diametrically opposite to said Church." In 1787, on a Sunday in November, the senior warden ordained the lay reader to be "rector, minister, priest, pastor, teaching elder, and public teacher" of King's Chapel.

The Episcopal

2. In May of that year, Thomas Coke and Francis Asbury had addressed to the President of the United States a memorial beginning, "We, the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The Methodists had previously occupied a position in the Church akin to that of various monastic orders in the Middle Ages. They were disliked by many bishops and other clergy, and were much spoken against both in England and in America; but this had been the case, no less, with the Franciscans. They continued, in spite of opposition, to be in good standing. Now Wesley had made Coke and Asbury superintendents of the Methodists in America, and had authorized them to ordain ministers. The separation logically followed. Wesley, indeed, deplored it. Dr. Coke presently proposed to Bishop White a reordination of the Methodist ministers, and by this means a reincorporation of the Methodist societies in the Episcopal Church ; but the vast importance of the Methodist movement was not foreseen, and the proposition was unhappily declined.

Church in America

And now, the work of construction being done, the Church, with all its fine new organization, fell upon evil days. The men who had done the work of pioneers and builders had used their best strength in these efforts, and were unable to meet the new difficulties which followed. Dr. Smith went back to his college in Philadelphia. Bishop Madison devoted himself to the College of William and Mary. Bishop Seabury put forth manifestos to his clergy beginning, "I, Samuel, by Divine permission Bishop of Connecticut, issue this injunction." Addressing the Presbyterians of the United States, he exhorted them to relinquish "those errors which they, through prejudice, had imbibed." Bishop Provoost resigned his diocese and spent his days translating Tasso. Bishop White declared that confirmation is not the most important function of a bishop. He attended to his parish in Philadelphia. Only once did he go beyond the mountains.

The Episcopal

These were but symptoms of a universal malady. The Revolution was followed throughout the States, in all the religious bodies, by a time of general apathy. Men were weary of the violence of the Great Awakening, and were so interested in the absorbing problems of political reconstruction that they had no time for religion. Faith was victoriously assailed by infidel arguments from France. Tom Paine was the most popular author of the day. No new churches were erected, and those already built were empty. In 1796, the Methodists had for three years lost annually four thousand members. In 1798, the Presbyterian General Assembly remarked with dismay "a visible and prevailing impiety and contempt for the laws and institutions of religion." There were few candidates for the ministry. In Virginia, Chief Justice Marshall, a faithful Churchman, thought the Church too far gone to be ever revived. In the General Convention of 1800, only seven dioceses were represented ; the House of Bishops, two in number, met in the hall bedroom of the rectory of St. Paul's, in Baltimore. In 1811, at the College of William and Mary, students were publicly debating "whether Christianity had been injurious or beneficial to mankind."

Church in America

CONTENTION : TO 1860

Out of this deep depression, the Church, with its neighbor churches, returned to life by the grace of God. The Christian religion has passed through many crises. Sometimes by reason of its foes, sometimes by reason of its friends, it has seemed at the point to die. But it possesses a victorious vitality.

The Episcopal

The War of 1812 strengthened the Church. It put an end to much of the political prejudice which had arisen from its position at the time of the Revolution. In the new strife with England, Churchman, Methodist, Baptist, Congregationalist, Presbyterian, fought side by side. They went into battle singing a national anthem written by a Churchman—Francis Key of Maryland,—The Star Spangled Banner.

In the opportunity thus made, new men came forward to meet the new conditions. In May, 1811, in Trinity Church, New York, John Henry Hobart was made Bishop of New York and Alexander Viets Griswold was made Bishop of New England. Hobart and Griswold revived the Church in the North. Richard Channing Moore of Virginia and John Stark Ravenscroft of North Carolina revived the Church in the South. They found weak and discouraged dioceses, and left them strong and full of faith and expectation.

Church in America

Hobart had the whole of New York State for his diocese, and up and down he went in it, ministering to scattered Church people, gathering them into parishes, preaching sermons, founding societies for the distribution of tracts, for the planting of Sunday-schools, for the advancement of missions, for the education of the clergy. He prepared a "Companion for the Altar" which quickened the devotion of communicants. He contended with the Presbyterians over the Apostolic Succession. He edited a Church newspaper. He began the evangelization of the Oneida Indians. No man equalled his initiative, his energy, his perseverance, his devotion; and wherever he went, without hesitation and without apology, he exalted the Church.

Griswold was given all of New England, except Connecticut. He was a man of the plain people. He had got his education by the light of a pine knot. In his first parish, he had maintained himself by teaching the district school in winter and working on his neighbors' farms in summer. Just after his election to the episcopate, there was a notable revival of religion in his parish at Bristol, Rhode Island. The whole town was stirred. This experience was repeated throughout his wide diocese. He traveled in stage coaches over long roads. He climbed the mountains. He preached in the woods. When he became bishop, the New England States, north of Connecticut, had been compelled to unite their feeble forces in a single diocese, and even then the Church was poor and weak. Griswold made five dioceses, self-supporting, vigorous, under four bishops.

The Episcopal

Ravenscroft found four churches in North Carolina, and left twenty-seven. Moore found five clergymen in Virginia and left one hundred. The southern dioceses, where the colonial church had been strongest, suffered most severely from the Revolution. Their connection with the English state was now their ill fortune. Their lands were taken away, their churches were destroyed, communion plate disappeared, fonts were used for watering troughs. The surviving Church people were in despair. The new bishops brought light into the midst of darkness. They endured hardship. They preached the Gospel. They attacked the growing evils of social life. They put the Church on record straight and clear, against unrighteousness. They were men of moral earnestness and of spiritual enthusiasm.

Church in America

But of these four bishops, two were high Churchmen and two were low Churchmen.

The Church of England, at the time of the Reformation, included all the English people. It contained in one comprehensive communion all the varieties of religious temperament. Some of its members set a very high estimate upon the institutions of religion ; that is, upon the ministry and the sacraments. Others set a lower value upon these institutions, esteeming them and using them but finding God directly, for themselves, without dependence upon rites or priests. Thus there were Churchmen, high and low. But they all lived together in one church. The formularies of the English Church were constructed with this situation in mind. It was by no mistaken ingenuity that John Robinson said at Leyden, "to the confession of faith published in the name of the Church of England and to every article thereof we assent wholly," and that Newman said at Oxford that the Articles were accordant with the Decrees of Trent. It was intended that all kinds of people should find in the Prayer-book abundant help and satisfaction. It was made an inclusive book.

The Episcopal

Church in America

But the Reformation time was one of strife, into which the Church of England inevitably fell. Presently, extreme men on one side went out of the Church and became Roman Catholics. Then extreme men on the other side went out and became Puritans. An endeavor to compel uniformity was much to blame for these separations. Disregarding the past and defying human nature, the effort was made to compel different people to be alike. Thenceforth, there were in England two religious parties, 'Churchmen and Dissenters ; and the Dissenters were of two kinds, Catholic and Protestant. Between these companies of dissenters, the Church went on, trying to be true to its primitive purpose, and still including men some of whom had sympathies with Rome, and some of them sympathies with Geneva. There they were, priests and prophets, institutionalists and individualists, high Churchmen and low Churchmen, in one fold. They quarreled more or less, in a domestic way ; but it was like the disputes of Democrats and Republicans. They were fellow citizens in the household of God. When they came to these shores, they sided, generally, one party with the Whigs, the other with the Tories. The Churchmen of the northern colonies, especially in New England, were mainly tories and high Churchmen, like Seabury. The Churchmen of the southern colonies, especially in Virginia, were mainly whigs and low Churchmen, like White.

The Episcopal

In the first quarter of the nineteenth century, the life and vigor of the Church both in England and America was with the low Churchmen ; in the second quarter of the century, the progress of religion in the Church in both countries was with the high Churchmen.

The first impulse of the new century was an Evangelical Movement. It was felt in common by all the churches, on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean. The

Church in America

Great Awakening and the Great Revival had met in Whitefield, who spoke for both. He died in Newburyport in 1770. On the last day of his life he preached from morning till night, and even then was followed to his lodgings by eager people desirous to hear the word of life again. He came down out of his bed-chamber, and stood in the doorway holding a lighted candle in his hands, and there spoke till the flame went out in the socket. That night he died. It was a symbol of the situation. The warmth and light of religion burned down into smoke and ashes. In the instructions of the pulpit, respectability became a substitute for Christianity.

The Evangelicals lighted the old fires again. They returned, in some respects, to the doctrines of Whitefield and Wesley. The first camp-meeting was held in the summer of 1800, and this assault upon apathy and iniquity proved at the moment most successful. At the same time, the Sunday-school, the invention of a Churchman, Robert Raikes of Gloucester, was brought into the active ministry of religion, first in England, then in this country. Presently, there was a generation of men and women to whom the Christian faith had been taught systematically. In spite of defects and errors of method, the Sunday-school changed the attitude of society toward religion. It reestablished the parishes on enduring foundations.

The Episcopal

Meanwhile, the evangelical ardor which was thus flaming forth in the camp-meeting and in the Sunday-school, was awakening both here and in England a new zeal for missions. In 1799, in London, the English Church Missionary Society was started. It began with a little group of obscure persons, rich only in their faith and strong only in their Christian courage, nobody paying any attention to them. It appealed to a Church half indifferent and half skeptical. It encircled the globe. A few years later, a little band of students at Williams College held a prayer-meeting in the shadow of a hay-stack and devoted themselves to the foreign field. At that time, there was not a missionary society in the country. These young men compelled the formation of one. In 1810, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was organized. In that year there was only one theological seminary in the country. That was at Andover, where it had been established to stay the progress of Unitarianism, which at that time had captured not only the first New England parish of the Churchmen, but the first New England college of the Puritans. Missionary societies and seminaries followed in all the churches.

Church in America

The emphasis of the evangelical movement was upon the individual as distinguished from the institution. It appealed to the soul of every man. It convicted men of sin. It converted them, through a prescribed spiritual experience, into disciples of Jesus Christ. Its characteristic doctrine was the Atonement. The evangelical Churchmen differed from their evangelical neighbors in their use of the Prayer-book. They brought their converts to baptism, to confirmation and to the Holy Communion. They maintained the self-restraint, the order and the reverent ways of the liturgical service. At the same time, agreeing as they did with their brethren of other names in their fundamental doctrines, sharing with them in the same religious experience and recognizing among them the fruits of the Spirit, they felt that they were all members together of the same family of faith. They wore the black gown of Geneva, and liked it.

The Episcopal

Then the evangelical movement waned, following the invariable precedent of all strong, partial emphasis. Some grew weary and indifferent, deaf to the old menaces and appeals, and cold to the approaches of revivalists. Based on emotion, the unstable foundation began to give way. Some gradually perceived that there were whole ranges of religious truth and great tracts of human nature which had been neglected. Thus an ecclesiastical movement followed.

Church in America

In 1827, Keble published the Christian Year. In 1833, he preached on National Apostasy. The Oxford tracts immediately followed. The new movement went upon the fact that man is not an individual only, he is a member of society, with social needs and responsibilities. It saw also that man is not all mind and soul, he has a body also. The men of the new thought laid hold on these neglected facts. Keble, and Pusey, and Newman called attention to the Church. They showed that it was no mere voluntary society associated in defense of a common faith and assembled for purposes of edification or of inspiration, but that it is the most venerable of institutions, descending out of the days of the apostles, having a continuous life, with ancient and significant traditions, with noble customs, dispensing grace and truth. They awakened again the primitive and ineradicable instinct of worship, and exalted the services and the sacraments as its occasions and opportunities and privileges. They summoned men to restore and beautify the neglected sanctuaries, to repair the altars of God that were broken down, and to keep again the old festivals of faith and devotion. They proclaimed the doctrine of the Incarnation, God in Christ, and Christ in the Church continually ministering to the world.

The Episcopal

The new movement met with opposition. Human nature is prudently conservative and reluctant to change its ways. It is also, after much hard experience, inclined to suspicion and is afraid that every new road, especially in religion, will lead eventually to the Nether Pit. The leaders of the Oxford Reformation were so hardly dealt with that some of them sought shelter in Rome. Their followers were preached against, written against, legislated against, and had their services interrupted by mobs. They were accused of disloyalty and falsehood. But the ecclesiastical movement like the evangelical movement before it, was ordained of God. It had its defects and follies. Here and there it lapsed into eccentricity, into individualism, into materialism and superstition. But it had a heart of truth. It affected all English-speaking Christendom.

Church in America

These two movements, ecclesiastical and evangelical, had their rise and their leadership in England, but they crossed the ocean. They brought into the Episcopal Church the spirit of their contention. In 1819, the General Theological Seminary was opened in New York. It had two professors and six students, and they met in the vestry room of St. Paul's Chapel. Mr. Clement C. Moore, who wrote "'Twas the Night Before Christmas," gave the school sixty lots in Chelsea Village. Mr. Jacob Sherred, a vestryman of Trinity Church, bequeathed it sixty thousand dollars. Bishop Hobart was the leading person in its founding and in determining its policy. It was a nursery of the ecclesiastical movement. Thirty years later, Arthur Carey came out of the seminary maintaining the position of Newman's Tract Ninety, and holding out fraternal hands to the brethren of Trent.

The Episcopal

In 1823, the Virginia Theological Seminary was founded at Alexandria. Bishop Moore was its foster father. It was a nursery of the evangelical movement. Young men went out from its instruction, many of them into the foreign field, preaching the gospel of experience as contrasted with the gospel of authority.

Such a situation led naturally to strife. At first, in the face of the great problems which confronted the Church in the new country, the two companies did each its own work in its own field. Bishop Hobart and Bishop Moore esteemed one another as brethren. The two seminaries, founded without intentional rivalry, were not conscious of competition. In 1835, when the first missionaries went from the Episcopal Church to China, one was Henry Lockwood, of the seminary in New York, and the other Francis Hansen of the seminary in Alexandria. Even in the heart of subsequent controversy, the contention in the Church in this country was not so bitter as it was in England. It is true that in 1852, Bishop Ives of North Carolina resigned his diocese and went off on one side to the Church of Rome; and not long after, in 1874, Bishop Cummins of Kentucky went off on the other side and started the Reformed Episcopal Church. But these were rare exceptions, and neither man carried many with him.

Church in America

Beneath all controversy, and behind

The Episcopal

all extreme and partisan statement, there was an abiding sense of the true nature of the Anglican Church. It was perceived by reflective and influential persons on each side that the genius of the Church is its catholic comprehensiveness, and that there is hospitable room in it, both for the institutionalism which in its extreme returns to the Middle Ages' and for the individualism which in its extreme goes the whole length of the Protestant Reformation. The General Convention of 1844, heard the men of the evangelical movement and the men of the ecclesiastical movement engage in long and vigorous debate, but it declined to commit itself to either side. "The liturgy, offices, and articles of the Church," it said, "are sufficient exponents of her sense of the essential doctrines of Holy Scripture." In these formularies, high Churchmen and low Churchmen stood alike, with equal confidence, and equal loyalty and equal right.

Church in America

This moderation of controversy was due in great part to the vast practical demands which were made upon the energies of the Church by the growing demands of the New West.

The work of domestic missions had been seriously hindered by an unfortunate inheritance of opinion. Even in the State, the unity of the nation was not generally discerned. It did not become a universal principle till it was determined by a civil war. In the Church, there was a like uncertainty. Each colony had had an independent ecclesiastical organization. They had stood apart like so many national churches. They had now come together, indeed, and made a confederation under a constitution, but the doctrine of diocesan rights went along with the doctrine of state rights, to which it corresponds. There was no clear general conception of an American Church.

The Episcopal

As a result, there was no sense of common initiative. The Church did not consider itself as a single church responsible in the land for the extension of the Kingdom of God. The General Convention felt no call to send out missionaries. In the State, when a district, in the course of human events, came to have a sufficient number of American citizens, it might, if it chose, request admission into the confederation of states. So when a state, in the providence of God, came to have a sufficient number of resident Churchmen, the parishes to which they belonged might, if they chose, organize themselves into a diocese and request admission into the confederation of dioceses.

Accordingly, that portion of the continent which we now call the Middle West had been left to go its own way. Among the settlers were many churchmen, who desired the service of the Church. Occasional pioneer priests ventured into the new places, and did what they could. But they were few in number, and the sheep, for the most part, had no shepherd. In the meantime, the Methodists, the Baptists, the Presbyterians, having ecclesiastical organizations easily adaptable to the frontier conditions, were building churches. And to these churches, as good Christians having no choice, the sons and daughters of the church were going. It is, indeed, a matter of note that the names of the distinguished families of Dutch colonists in New York, of Puritan colonists in Massachusetts, and of Quaker colonists in Pennsylvania, are now found on the communicant lists of the church ; but in the Middle West, the descendants of church colonists are largely to be found to-day in the denominational churches.

THE RIGHT REV. JACKSON KEMPER, D. D.

(See page 125)

Church in America

This neglect was amended and at last ended by the example of Bishop Chase and Bishop Otey.

Philander Chase, Deacon Chase's fifteenth child, was born in a log cabin in

The Episcopal

Vermont. At Dartmouth College he found a Prayer-book and became a churchman. Taking orders, he became itinerant missionary to the northern and western parts of the diocese of New York. He went about preaching in the little settlements, when stumps of trees were still standing in the unfenced streets of Utica, and a solitary man in a cabin was boiling salt on the site of Syracuse. The people of New Orleans having asked for a Protestant minister, Bishop Moore persuaded Chase to go. There he founded Christ Church in 1805. Returning to the north, after a serious illness, he became rector of Christ Church, Hartford. Thence he pushed out to the newly settled plantations of Ohio. In 1818, the five clergymen of Ohio, with a few laymen, chose Chase for bishop. After a dozen years, he resigned his diocese in the midst of a disagreement with his clergy, and moved on into the wilds of Illinois. At Chicago, where there were three houses

Church in America

and a fort, a treaty was being made with the Indians. The plains were dotted with wigwams, and savages were dancing around their camp-fires. In 1835, the three clergymen of Illinois with the laymen of their parishes made Chase their bishop. Thus he founded two dioceses. In each of these dioceses, he built a college,—Kenyon in Ohio, Jubilee in Illinois. It was a good season for planting colleges. Trinity was founded by Bishop Brownell, at Hartford, in 1824, as a refuge from the denominational limitations of Yale. Hobart was established at Geneva, in 1825, on foundations laid by Bishop Hobart, with funds provided by Trinity church, New York. Chase established his colleges partly for general education as the basis of good churchmanship and good citizenship, but chiefly for the training of young men for the ministry. To get funds for his colleges he went to England and there attracted great attention and obtained large gifts from wealthy and titled persons. A frontiersman, strong, handsome, fresh from a career of adventure, familiar with the wild woods, and yet a bishop, he impressed the imagination of the English.

The Episcopal

Chase's mission to Ohio and Illinois was paralleled by Otey's mission to Tennessee and Kentucky. James Hervey Otey was born on a farm in Virginia. He went to Tennessee to teach school. Attending a service held by a wandering missionary, he was baptized, and applied for ordination. At that time there was not an Episcopal congregation in the state. Few people knew anything about the Episcopal church, and these few disliked it. Otey's stalwart manliness and genuine religion compelled attention. In 1829, he and three other clergymen organized the diocese of Tennessee, and he was presently made bishop. A schoolmaster like Chase, he appreciated the value of a school. He planted one for boys and one for girls. He began an alliance between church-manship and education which afterward resulted, in 1856, in the University of the South.

Church in America

Chase and Otey, with their new dioceses, stirred in the general church a zeal for missions. They put an end to the attitude of passive waiting. At the General Convention of 1835, just fifty years after the initial convention at which the church effected its organization, it was definitely proclaimed that the whole church is a missionary society, and every baptized member of it a missionary. This had already been perceived, and a board of missions had existed since 1821, but the convention of 1835 made it a living fact by sending a missionary bishop. Jackson Kemper was made bishop of the northwest. That was the year in which the young men from the two seminaries started for China.

Kemper founded churches in Iowa, in Minnesota, in Missouri, in Wisconsin. In Wisconsin he established schools at

The Episcopal

Nashotah. James Lloyd Breck, priest and pioneer, started schools in Minnesota at Faribault, and leaving enduring foundations on which other men should build, pushed on and on, across the plains, across the mountains, till he built a school on the coast of the Pacific, at Benicia. Other missionaries followed, presbyters and bishops. Kip ministered to the miners of '49, Scott founded the diocese of Oregon, Whipple became the apostle to the Indians. Within fifteen years after the consecration of the first missionary bishop, both the clergy list and the communicant list had more than doubled. The seven hundred clergy of 1835 had become fifteen hundred; the thirty-six thousand communicants had become eighty thousand.

Nevertheless, the Church was still, in method and in purpose, a sect. The Convention of 1835, by sending a missionary bishop, had proclaimed a consciousness of corporate life and opportunity. But, with the exception of its mode of government, the Church had not adapted itself to the general situation. It stood in the old ways, and minded the rubrics and canons which had done good service in the ancient dioceses of England. Many of its clergy and people were still of the temper of the early Churchmen of the colony of Massachusetts, who wrote to the Venerable Society that they maintained "an offensive demeanor toward them that are without." The Prayer-book, for example, was presented in sacred entirety to the Scotch-Irish settlers along the Mississippi, to the Indians in the region of the Great Lakes, and to the miners by the Sacramento River. If they did not understand it, if they resented it, the Church deplored their ignorance or their prejudice.

Church in America

But this,—to apply our Lord's words about catching men,—was to blame the fish instead of changing the bait. It was the policy upon which Braddock had insisted when he met the Indians in battle on the bank of the Monongahela River. Braddock had learned war in Europe, where soldiers fought in platoons. When Colonel Washington counseled him that in Western Pennsylvania it was the custom to fight from behind trees, Braddock rejected the advice as novel and indecent. In all the prescriptions of respectable and conventional warfare, there was not a mention of a tree. Braddock said, as he fell mortally wounded in the midst of complete defeat, "I will do better another time." It seemed to some far-sighted and sagacious Churchmen of the middle of the nineteenth century that that other time had now properly come in the experience of the Church. In the General Convention of 1853, Dr. Muhlenberg, on behalf of a number of notable signers, offered a memorial to the House of Bishops.

The Episcopal

The memorialists raised the question "whether the Protestant Episcopal Church, with only her present canonical and traditional customs and usages, is competent to the work of preaching and dispensing the Gōspel to all sorts and conditions of men, and so adequate to do the work of the Lord in this land and in this age." This question, for their part, they answered in the negative. "Our Church," they said, "confined to the exercise of her present system, is not sufficient" for this work. The remedy which they proposed touched the two most obvious characteristics of the Episcopal Church: it is episcopal and it is liturgical. It is the church of the bishop and of the book. Concerning the book, they proposed to loosen the law of uniformity. They would admit to the communion of the Church, "without that entire surrender which would now be required of them, of all the liberty in public worship to which they have been accustomed," the ministers and congregations of other religious bodies. Concerning the bishop, they proposed to give him greater freedom of leadership and of personal initiative. They would have him in a position to welcome such ministers and congregations, to ordain the ministers, and to receive the congregations, letting them go on, for the most part, in their own way. Thus they anticipated an increase of Christian unity, and a relation of the Church to the whole people of the land.

Church in America

The Episcopal

This memorial, written by William Augustus Muhlenberg, was taken up with enthusiasm by Alonzo Potter. These and other like-minded men were Churchmen of a type which was both new and old. New in a time of contention which had parted the Church into two camps, it was nevertheless a return to the wider spirit of that former time when in England the Church and the nation had been identical. They were comprehensive Churchmen. In Muhlenberg's phrase, they were Evangelical Catholics.

Church in America

Muhlenberg was a comprehensive priest. He founded the free Church of the Holy Communion in New York, and named it for the fraternal rather than for the sacramental spirit in religion. He had daily services, weekly communion, and a boy choir. He was the first to make use of trees at Christmas and of flowers at Easter. He started the Fresh Air Fund. He founded St. Luke's Hospital.

Potter was a comprehensive bishop. He found Pennsylvania divided, according to the bad way of the time, into wrangling parties. He became the bishop of neither party, and of both. He welcomed into his diocese, and sustained with his sympathy and appreciation, devout, faithful, and effective clergymen, regardless of their position concerning points then controverted. He was, moreover, a citizen as well as a bishop. He commended the Church to the people of the Commonwealth, not on the basis of authority or of the past, but on the basis of present love, faith, and good works.

The Episcopal

The memorial was referred to a committee to report to the next General Convention. It was discussed and discussed. Then the Civil War diverted men's attention, and no action was taken. But the way had been opened toward a larger churchmanship, in a finer spirit, intent on the illimitable expansion of the Church.

ACCESSION : TO 1907

The approach of the contest between the North and the South raised the question as to the association of religion with politics. Shall the Church take sides in the contention of the States? Some said, yes; following the precedents of Isaiah and Jeremiah. Some said, no; quoting from the epistles of St. Paul. On behalf of the political action of the Church was the voice of conscience, asserting that slavery was a matter of morals. On behalf of abstinence from such action was the voice of experience, recalling how the Church had been hindered in her progress by entangling alliances with the House of Stuart and with the House of Hanover. Moreover, it was urged, the rights and wrongs of the dispute were by no means clear. The relation of the states to the nation was still uncertain. Is there a sovereign nation, as they said at the North, one and indivisible, now and forever? Or, is there a confederation of sovereign states, from which any state is free to resign at will? And as for slavery, while most men at the North and some in the South disliked it, would it be ended most successfully by the violence of war?

Church in America

In this perplexity, some Churchmen took one side and some another. Bishop McIlvaine of Ohio answered the call of President Lincoln, and went to England with Archbishop Hughes, Henry Ward

The Episcopal

Beecher, and Thurlow Weed to persuade the English people not to recognize the Confederacy; and there he did notable service. Bishop Polk of Louisiana answered the call of President Davis, and became a general in the Confederate Army. But McIlvaine and Polk had been friends since Polk was a cadet at West Point and McIlvaine was chaplain there. Polk had been converted by McIlvaine, and they had entered into a solemn compact to pray each for the other, by name, every Sunday morning.

That, in less dramatic form, was a general situation. Owing, in great part, to the triennial meetings of the General Convention, Churchmen north and south were personal friends. Sometimes the Convention met in the North, sometimes in the South, and always the roll of delegates began with Alabama and went down along the lengthening list of states. On the whole, the largest number of conspicuous Churchmen in the war were on the Southern side. Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States, was a Churchman. Robert E. Lee, commander-in-chief of the Confederate forces, was a Churchman.

THE REV. JAMES DE KOVEN, D. D.

(See page 139)

Church in America

In 1861, the southern dioceses followed the secession of the Southern States. They met in convention, and adopted a constitution and canons. But in 1862, at the General Convention in New York the roll call began as always with Alabama. The Church, like the nation, recognized no partition. At the same time, the Convention adopted a resolution affirming the duty of Churchmen to sustain and defend the country and praying for the restoration of the Union. And then they went to keep a day of penitence and fasting in Trinity Church, whose rector's father, General Dix, had spoken his mind on the subject of tearing down the American flag in words which stirred the nation. In 1865, the roll was called again, and North Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas answered. The southern dioceses returned as the Southern States came back into the Union. They had been absent from only one convention.

The Episcopal

When the war was over, and men were able to think of other things, the attention of the Church was taken for a time by the old strife of parties. This now took the form of a discussion as to the essential meaning of the sacraments.

As regards the sacrament of baptism, the discussion centred about the word "regeneration." This word had been used in connection with baptism since the time of the New Testament, but the Great Awakening and the Great Revival had laid hold upon it for another purpose, and had thus given it, to the popular mind, another and quite different meaning. The low Churchmen, taking this meaning, were loath to use the word; some of them omitted it. In 1871, the bishops issued a declaration to the effect that in their judgment "the word ‘regenerate’ is not there so used as to determine that a moral change in the subject of baptism is wrought by the Sacrament.”

Church in America

As regards the Holy Communion, the discussion turned upon the matter of ritual. The high Churchman held a doctrine of the Eucharist akin to that which was held in the Middle Ages, and they desired to express it by forms and ceremonies such as were used in the Latin Mass. The low Churchman held a doctrine of the Lord’s Supper akin to that which was held by the Swiss reformers, and they objected strongly to such forms and ceremonies.

The debate engaged the energies of the Church till the General Convention of 1874. It was ably led for the high Churchmen, by James DeKoven, whose saintly life gave weight to his arguments. It was formally decided by a canon on ritual, adverse to the ritualists. The debates, however, had so established the principle of ritual liberty that the decision made little difference in practice. Afterward, in 1903, when the canons were revised, these prohibitions had no friends.

The Episcopal

These discussions, with which the hostility between high church people and low came presently to an end, were followed in the Church by two revisions, first of the Prayer-book, then of the canons. They were mainly in the direction indicated by the Memorial of 1853. The alterations of the liturgy provided both for the amendment and for the elasticity of the services. They were set forth in a "Book Annexed" to the report of a committee, which was related to the Prayer-book of 1892, as the "Proposed Book" was related to the Prayer-book of 1789; except that most of the suggestions of the Book Annexed were adopted. The alterations in the canons were mostly for the purpose of making the Church more effective as a power for righteousness. They undertook a division of the national church into provinces, for the sake of better legislation. They made more strict the regulations regarding the growing evil of divorce.

Church in America

The Memorial appeared most clearly in a Declaration of the Bishops in 1880 on Christian Unity, and in the debates arising from an endeavor to make this declaration available for use in our present difficulties. The pronouncement affirmed four essentials to the restoration of unity : the Scriptures, the two Creeds, the two Sacraments, and the Historic Episcopate.

During the progress of these debates within the Church, two new movements were beginning in English-speaking Christendom at large. One concerned the relation between Religion and Science ; the other concerned the relation between Religion and Society.

In 1859, Darwin published the "Origin of Species." The doctrine of evolution, thus for the first time brought to the attention of the people in general, was there applied to the natural history of man. The Copernican theory of the universe had already shown that the earth is but an insignificant bit of matter among the innumerable hosts of stars. The Darwinian theory seemed now to show that even on this discredited planet, man is but a higher species of animal. Moreover, in the unbroken sequence of events, effect following cause, man coming from the animals, and animals from plants, and plants from the earth, with natural selection and survival of the fittest accounting for all changes, there appeared to be no room for God. Along with the degradation of man went the expulsion of God. Thus, in the third quarter of the century, it seemed to many as if the foundations of the world were out of course.

The Episcopal

Presently it appeared, indeed, that the doctrine of evolution as applied to the life of man had no such direful consequences as had at first been feared, but the idea of growth, which, was the heart of truth in it, proved to be filled with explosive forces. It was applied to all departments of thought. History began to be rewritten: the present began to be interpreted by its source in the past. Thus our most cherished convictions appeared not only to have grown, through many changes, from remote ages, but to be growing and changing still. Everything was therefore in a state of flux. Yesterday our fathers believed that, to-day we believe this, to-morrow our children shall believe the other.

Church in America

The resulting contest between science and religion turned at first upon the meaning of the first chapters of Genesis. Soon the whole book, from the Garden of Eden to the Day of Judgment, was subjected to question and criticism. Under the compulsion of the new theory of growth, men began to ask, How, then, did the Bible grow? A new science of Bible study came into existence. The doctrine of evolution was, accordingly, one of the most unsettling forces which have ever turned the whole world upside down.

The Episcopal

At the same time, in the world of society, great upheavals were taking place. It is true that the epoch-making book had been published long before. Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," which is related to the problems of modern society, as the "Origin of Species" is related to the problems of modern science, had appeared in the same year with the Declaration of Independence. And, the year before, James Watt had begun the manufacture of steam engines. But the new forces made their way slowly.

It was not till after our Civil War that the working-man obtained the right to vote in England. Thereupon the new voters legalized the trades-union. In 1875, they abolished the old law of conspiracy, thereby making democracy secure, and setting master and man on the same footing. Then the strikes began : at first in England, where the lot of the working-man was hard ; then in this country, where it was becoming equally hard. Already in England, between 1832 and 1848, the strife about the Corn Laws had convinced the working-men that the land owners were their enemies,—and the land owners belonged mostly to the Church of England ; and the strife about the Factory Acts had convinced the working-men that the mill owners were their enemies,—and the mill owners belonged mostly to the congregations of dissent. This separation between the wage earners and the churches was brought over here. Then Socialism came in, to inform and stimulate all this unrest.

Church in America

Meanwhile, with the growth of great cities and the consequent crowding of vast populations in tenement houses, the unit of the parish changed. The parochial unit had been the family :—father, mother and children living under a single roof and sitting together in one pew. Now it was the individual. In the face of this change, the old parochial machinery became useless. The methods which had availed under the old conditions no longer affected people who had changed both their outlook upon life and their way of living. The little fish escaped through the big meshes of the parish net. Churches gave up in despair, and moved uptown, where family life was still of the conventional kind. Thus the gulf between the rich and the poor, between the employer and the employed, between the Church and great masses of the people, widened.

The Episcopal

These two movements, intellectual and social, were for the last half of the nineteenth century what the evangelical and ecclesiastical movements had been for the first half. They demanded a new kind of churchmanship, and the broad Churchman appeared.

Church in America

At first, the interests of the new Churchmen were engaged in the questions arising out of the debates between religion and science. As the "Tracts for the Times" had announced the ecclesiastical movement, so "Essays and Reviews," published in 1860, announced the intellectual movement in the Church. The contention was for fearless study, unfailing pursuit of truth, and freedom of expression. Then, with Frederick Maurice and Charles Kingsley, the social interest was added. The two went on side by side in the souls of the same men. Their desire was to commend religion on the one side to the scholar, and on the other side to the wage-earner. They read the "Wealth of Nations" and the "Origin of Species," with profound sympathy, finding truth in both. They called themselves evolutionists, and made much of the doctrine of Immanence; that is, of the universal, pervading presence of God, in whom our life consists, and who manifests Himself as well in the natural as in the supernatural. They called themselves socialists, and preached the Brotherhood of Man, taking up the cause of the oppressed, fighting the battles of the poor.

The Episcopal

Some of these men were high Churchmen, who gave ritualism a new meaning by their self-sacrifice in the slums. Some were low Churchmen who vindicated again the supremacy of the spirit over the letter. They made mistakes, went off on this side and on that into extremes, got themselves accused of heresy, and were exposed to all the misunderstanding and criticism which had previously attended the evangelical movement and the ecclesiastical movement. But through this they lived and prospered, winning new victories for truth and for the Church.

The intellectual aspects of the new broad Churchmanship were most notably represented in this country by Phillips Brooks, the greatest preacher of his generation. Its social aspects appeared most eminently in St. George's parish, in New York, the pioneer and pattern of the "institutional" churches.

Church in America

The Episcopal Church had now fairly entered upon the larger life and maturer strength in the courage of which she celebrates her three hundredth anniversary. Without and within, old prejudices had been dispelled, and new activities had been undertaken. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew stirred the souls of young Churchmen. Church clubs united the parishes of large cities. Religious orders gave new opportunities for devotion and service. Deaconesses were trained. Hospitals were erected. Cathedrals began to appear, centres of diocesan industry and inspiration. Boys' schools, St. Paul's at Concord, New Hampshire, St. Mark's and Groton in Massachusetts, and many others, began to make the influence of the Church felt in a new way among the privileged and influential. New seminaries for the training of the clergy sprang up and grew strong :—Berkeley in Middletown in 1850, the Philadelphia Divinity School in 1862, the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge in 1867, the Western Theological Seminary at Chicago in 1885, the Church Divinity School of the Pacific in 1894. Missions were extended, at home and abroad. Bishops and clergy and women helpers went to China, to Japan, to Alaska, to the Philippine Islands. The Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions multiplied both interest and efficiency. All this is of our own time. The good of it, and the glory of it, and the men and women who have done it, are known to us. Another historian, for another anniversary, will give them the praise which is their due.

The Episcopal

The fifteen hundred clergy of 1835, have become five thousand ; the eighty thousand communicants have become eight hundred thousand. Thanks be to God for all His many mercies. Peace and joy, with growth in grace, and godly quietness, and good works, and favor with God and man, be to the Church always, through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

Church in America

Suggested Readings

History of the Protestant Episcopal Church.—C. C. Tiffany.

History of the American Episcopal Church.—S. D. McConnell.

The Church in America.—Leighton Coleman.

The Episcopalians.—D. D. Addison.

The Cradle of the Republic.—L. G. Tyler.

Old Virginia and Her Neighbors.—John Fiske.

The Beginnings of New England.—John Fiske.

England in America.—L. G. Tyler.

William White.—J. H. Ward.